Nick Montfort

The last stair of 34th Street, Herald Square; at my feet a clamor of trains that weave iron mazes.
Steam and shrieks ascend the morning, which, at once, becomes the final reckoning, the ultimate sale, the blackest Friday. From the obscured horizon and from the center of my being, an infinite voice said these things (these actual stock-keeping units, not the words that follow, which are but my poor time-bound translation of what was a single word): “Playing-cards, chessboards, a nice hardback copy of the Grettir

In vain oceans have been squandered on you, in vain New York's retail operations, marveled at by Whitman.
You have consumed the years and they have consumed you, and still . . . you have not generated the novel."
